DIVERSITY AND THE BOTTOM LINE

Managing the tension between billable hours and workplace inclusiveness requirements.

They say that the practice of law is a jealous mistress. Yet, as law firm profitability is squeezed like never before, firms must manage around numerous labor laws which entitle employees to attend to outside interests during the work day. These laws provide an ever expanding list of requirements mandating flexibility when managing when, where and how much we can expect our employees to work. These laws specifically require firms to “accommodate” a long list of outside interests and outlaw “interference” with these protections. Since these laws typically ascribe stiff penalties when the rules are not strictly observed, everyone with managerial responsibility must recognize precisely when these rules come into play. Our speaker is Richard S. Rosenberg, a founding partner in the Universal City employer side employment law boutique Ballard Rosenberg Golper & Savitt, LLP. Richard has been advising employers in the area of human resource law for 30+ years. In this dynamic and informative program, Richard will address the many distractions to employee productivity which command legal protection.
